Company Philosophy

From our point of view, there are three types of photographs:

- 1) "Snapshots": Designed to remind the viewer of a moment they experienced and to bring back the feeling of that moment.
- 2) "Emotion shots": The purpose of these is to elicit an emotional response from the viewer even if the viewer did not experience the moment when it occurred.
- 3) "Art shots": These are usually for pure beauty. Landscapes often fall into this category.

Certainly, it is possible to combine two or even all three of these categories into a single shot. For example, a wedding kiss will remind those who witnessed it of the moment, show the emotion of love to those who didn't, and, if done properly, be beautiful and artistic as well.

Our company philosophy is built into our name, "Stories in Pictures Photography." We seek to combine the types of shots listed above into a story told in photographs. This means, someone who did not attend the event should be able to understand the event, from start to finish, just by seeing the pictures. They should feel as though they were there, to some extent. They should feel some of the emotion the attendees felt. They should see the beauty of the event.

This is no easy task. The average person taking snapshots of an event will tend to produce an album of disconnected images that are not too useful to those who did not attend. This is why seeing an album from a friend's vacation is often not very interesting. It's like seeing a movie by seeing 50 one-second clips taken from random places throughout the show. There may be nice images, but the story is lost.

So how do you tell a "Story in Pictures?" In a word, "planning." It's important to understand the event before it happens, to find the crucial times in the event, and to have a plan to capture them. This usually means discussing the event with those who are planning it, visiting the locations, and learning what is needed to tell the story that is to take place. Of course, it may also take good equipment and technical skill. But a camera does not make a photographer, just as a violin does not make a musician.

Meet with us, and we'll come up with a customized plan just for your event!
